The key to this kind of constructivist proposal is not the reduction of moral properties to natural properties; rather, the key is a self-authenticating account of the standards of practical reason. In order for this equation to pick out a response-dependent property, there are other conditions that must also obtain. While Kantian constitutivism faces objections peculiar to it because of its appeal to the value of Constructivism in Ethics, other objections apply to all sorts of constitutivism.

But importantly, neither Rawls nor Scanlon provides an account of the nature of moral properties. I argue that a failure to make this distinction is part of what explains why the possibility of constructivism as a metaethical view is often overlooked. Zalta ed.
